DAILY BRIEF

Greece: The resignation of Premier Karamanlis after nearly eight years in office will probably lead to a period of instability in Greek politics.

Karamanlis has recommended to King Paul that immediate elections be held for a new parliament, but the King may first investigate the possibility of forming a government under someone else. A split in the ranks of Karamanlis' right-wing National Radical Union is possible and might lead to a new government including opposition elements. Nevertheless, his cabinet appears to have been united in backing him on the issue that led to his resignation--the King's projected visit to Britain against the premier's advice.

Should elections be called, an interim period of 45 days under a caretaker government will be necessary while election lists are prepared. The opposition parties have charged that in the 1961 elections voters were coerced by a caretaker government formed by a personal friend of the King, and similar charges may be made this time.

Also at issue will be the method of voting used. The opposition demands that the proportional representation system be reintroduced, in the belief that they would fare better than under the simple majority system required under present law.

(Recent de facto cooperation between the moderate opposition Center Union and the Communist-dominated United Democratic Left (EDA) may continue during the election period, although a formal alliance is unlikely. [REDACTED])

*Peru: With unofficial returns about 88 percent complete, Fernando Belaunde Terry has apparently been elected to the presidency.

Belaunde has almost 40 percent of the votes, Haya de la Torre of APRA 33 percent, and former dictator Odria 26.5 percent. Odria has conceded Belaunde's victory.

Haya de la Torre has remained silent, however, and his followers have accused the army of failing to deliver proper ballots to pro-APRA districts in the north. APRA plans to demand new elections in those districts if Belaunde's final over-all margin drops to 50,000 votes--Haya's margin over Belaunde in those districts in 1962. If Belaunde's margin, which now stands at about 100,000, remains significantly more than 50,000, Haya will concede.

APRA expects to get 40 percent of the seats in the new congress, and expects Belaunde's party to get about the same. Haya told his executive committee that APRA would agree to collaborate with Belaunde in congress if Belaunde would refrain from collaboration with the Communists.

Haya does not expect an offer of collaboration from Belaunde under that condition, however, and APRA is preparing to oppose any measures that will benefit the Communists. APRA leaders expect the major battle with the Communists will result from Communist efforts to take over APRA-led labor unions, which have been a prime Communist target for many years.

Pakistan--SEATO: (As part of its campaign against Western military assistance to India, the Pakistani Government has requested that SEATO's military planning office be directed to plan for the defense of Pakistan against any future Indian "aggression.")

(As Pakistani authorities probably do not expect such a request to be granted, the move may be intended to lay the groundwork for announcing a cut-back in Pakistan's cooperation in SEATO.)

(Pakistan has tried for years to persuade both CENTO and SEATO that the pacts should protect the regional members from their local "enemies" as well as from the Communist bloc. Now, however, Pakistan fears that its ties with its Western allies are being given second place to a developing de facto alliance between India and the West.)
